The expression on the face of Webster during the address of Mr. Stapler might have been taken for that of the ordinary, carlous interest worn by the casual court auditor.

Evelyn Granville was not in court during the morning, and many people who had come expecting to see her and her budy boy, flurtion C. Webster, fr., went away.

"If the defense of self-actersse is declared to be good here," said Mr. Stapler, "all any man's enemy need do is to go to that man's own home, alone, shoot him down to detth in boid blood, and then say, 'I ast' d is self-defense.' Dead men tell no takes No voice will be raised against him."

Mr. Stapler taiked exactly one hour, and at 11.40 o'clock the first witness was called to the stand—Douglas Smyth, a draughtsman and architect.

Witness Smyth identified a diagram of the third floor of the Percival as one made by him directly after the 'tragedy."

He related that the distance from Webster's door to Goodwin's was 49 lect, and that the own was reached from the other by traversing an L hail.
